

Black Engineering Student Society sponsors event

Fashion Glimpse

By Christine Brophy

You don't have to go to New York to see a live fashion show. Last Friday, the Northeastern University's Black Engineering Students' Society held their 20th Anniversary fashion show.

Models strutted across the runway in step with the live DJ music. Every step, turn and pose was in sync. A large video screen off to the side of the runway played the show live. Often it was the only way to see when the audience got so enthused that they would stand and block the view.

Over a dozen male and female models, including NU's football players Silas Calhoun and Jason Seapker, showed off the latest fashions in casual, sports, business, Kente, semiformal and swim wear. Apparel by Express, Structure, Cignals and Filenes were used in the show.

The crowd often went into a frenzy when the male models came out and cheered throughout the different scenes. During the business scene, four male models came out in white, sage, beige and black suits sporting cellular phones. The crowd exploded.

Casual wear for women included pink and sage leggings, tunics, and floral dresses. Men's casual featured denim shorts and long Ts in neutral colors.

The Kente scene featured a lot of wraps in exotic prints in your basic autumn colors - rust, orange, green and brown.

The crowd was ecstatic during the concluding swimsuit scene where women wore bright green, pink and orange one- and two-piece swimsuits. Men came out in basic swim trunks. One male model stripped down to a racing-style bikini that read "Huskies" across the rear.

